Some of these delicious dishes can potentially disrupt your digestion. Food and wine that come together in perfect and delicious harmony. We all have activities that we love or foods that we long for that we think of guilty pleasures, things that are not good for us, or that we feel would embarrass us if anyone else knows, but that we enjoy anyway. Maybe you like reading airport novels, or lit chick, or true confessions. Maybe you like double fudge chocolate ice cream with chocolate sauce and chocolate sprinkles, or rubber worms, or expensive imported truffles. Maybe you cry in cheerful romantic comedies, or obsess over 1960s B movies, or calls like a girl in slasher photos. Whatever it is, your pleasure is tempered a bit by guilt. Some guilty pleasures make us feel guilty because they are so bad for us - fattening foods, time-wasting games, sitcoms sucking IQ. Others are not necessarily bad for us, but we fear for in our reputation if the word came out. They make us look lower class or un-intellectual or unseen or immature. Guilt ultimately arises, however, from the pleasure itself. Our modern society, with its work ethic and deeply committed commitment — through diet, through extreme sports, through self-help books, through an endless stream of products and media that all promise a better you! - you have pleasure in a fairly low esteem. It is seen, at best, as a reward, albeit somewhat disreputable, for the success of all the work. But more often it is seen as a luxury, and one expendable in that. The poor are in contempt for their continued willingness to have DVD players, the rich for their decline. Food, we are told, is only for body feeding; sex, we are told, is only for the reproduction of the species. The pleasure for the love of pleasure is to avoid it, and those looking for it should be diverted. Hence the guilty pleasure – what we do just because it makes us feel good. It's embarrassing to look after the empty calories of the flusy snack, fluffy novel, or childhood hobby. It is a betrayal of the fundamental principles on which our society is based. It's time to attack the guilty pleasure phrase of your vocabulary. The idea that those things that distract us from the real work of life should be celebrated in contempt is of course good for those who benefit most from our work, but it is not good for the rest of us. Work is good, of course – things have to be done – but pleasureless work is for automata, not for humans. In fact, it is the guilty pleasures that we should feel less guilty about, because they are the things where we are most fully our own people. Behind the concept of guilty pleasure is a demand for conformity. Don't eat this, see this, read this, do this, be that. It is an insistence that there are certain things that we are supposed to eat, see, read, do, be, if we are to be taken seriously as adults. It is an insistence, in fact, on being normal - or even worse, mean. I challenge it. I hear you thinking: But certainly, if something is unhealthy for you, and you do it anyway, you should feel guilty about it – it's the only way you're gong to stop! And of course, if your diet consists solely of guilty pleasures, if your reading is entirely guilty pleasures, if your life is consumed by the search for increasingly guilty pleasures, that's a problem. If your guilt stems from your concern about the lack of willpower or discipline that is causing you real damage, you absolutely should be dealing with that. It's probably not the guilty pleasure that's to blame, though – you need to work some balance on your life as a whole. But more often than not, our guilty pleasures are an exception, a small part of a life that is otherwise already well balanced. That is, you can probably afford to enjoy a guilty pleasure or two without any if it gives you pleasure and is not likely to kill you, by all means, dig! Same with the rest of guilty pleasures. Guilty, his guilt stems from the fear of what other people would think if they knew it, and he is no longer in middle school, you have to deal with his lack of self-confidence, not his appreciation of Top 40 music. As with so much else, it boils down to a matter of balance. If your life drags on very well, thank you, and you've just had an inordinate fondness for Troll dolls, I'm telling you to know each other. On the other hand, if your eating habits or entertainment preferences leave you unable to cope with your life - or if they are the only consolation in your life - you need to give a serious idea to discover more nutritious pleasures - or build a more nutritious life. Don Penny Lately I've been listening to British detective novels like audiobooks in the car, and also while walking or folding clothes or washing dishes. I write novels that are described as literary fiction, but I end up hearing criminal stories at any minute off. I just finished the three novels that J.K. Rowling wrote as Robert Galbraith, about Detective Cormoran Strike. Rowling is a genius of narrative tension and in passing the viewpoint perfectly between Strike and his skillful and dubious assistant, Robin Ellacott. I desperately want these characters to be happy, and I couldn't solve any of the mysteries before they did. Philip Pullman's children's Sally Lockhart series, written for children but suitable for adults, is perfect audiobooks. So are Kate Atkinson's detective novels (and her non-detective novels). John le Carré's first two books were very short murder mysteries, before switching to spies. Sarah Waters's Fingersmith and The Paying Guests are about crime, and also about love, secrecy, history, betrayal and sacrifice. I was watching Happy Valley and stopped it when my husband came in. He looked at the screen and said: It's raining, there's a police officer, they're driving left, everyone seems unhappy, there's probably a corpse. It must be one of Maile's shows. In The Guilty Vicarage, W.H. Auden said detective stories were escapism for those with a sense of guilt, who wanted to hear it thrown out. But I think for me it's more about the cathartic fantasy of exposing and containing evil. Even when the protagonists are flawed and frustrated and the ambiguous endings – perhaps especially then – the model remains: The bad guys lie unashamedly, the brilliant, dogged detective catches them in their lies, and justice is done. Nothing, these days, is more satisfying than that. Maile Meloy's new novel, Do Not Be Alarmed, will be published in June by Riverhead.This story originally appeared in the June/July 2017 issue of Town & Country. First, I have to say, the performances in this week's Guilty Pleasures-themed edition were the best they've been all season - celebrities really brought their game A. Last night's elimination show left professional wrestler Chris Jericho and his partner Cheryl Burke out of competition. With his great attitude about it, things didn't seem so bad: he was ready to come home to his family. This week, each couple performed to a song they considered a guilty pleasure. Read on below to get more of my thoughts on this week's series. Chelsea team Let's say, I think I could go on strike against the show if Disney Chelsea star Kane doesn't make it all the way through. I know I talk about her every week, but she is by far the most talented. On Monday night she and her partner Mark Ballas performed the quickst stride and received 28/30 points, taking first place alongside rapper Romeo. Hanson and Backstreet Boys? On Monday night, 1990s pop band Hanson thanked Dancing with the Stars for singing hits from their new album and its most popular tune Mmm Bop. I didn't even know the band still existed! In addition to Hanson's surprising return last night, the Backstreet Boys performed alongside New Kids on the Block. The two groups will begin touring together later this year. Another fall? As a dancer, I know that being perfect is not possible. However, we seem to have witnessed the fallout after autumn this season. On Monday night, professional dancer Karina Smirnoff stumbled during her Double Step with contestant and actor Ralph Macchio. The pair received a score of 24/30 and great feedback from the judges for their ability to overcome the setback. Kendra, oh Kendra Finally former Playboy man Kendra Wilkinson was in her element with the Samba, impressing the judges by finishing off a full-body shimmy at the top of her table. For the first time throughout the season he performed at a very high level and surprised the crowd. Check your safe performance below. Until next week... happy dancing! – Olivia Putnal, Assistant Editor This content is created and maintained by a third party, and imported into this page to help users provide their email addresses.
