So today Instagram is announcing a bevvy of security updates to protect users and give them more than one voice. More significantly, Instagram will now allow users to appeal the company's decision to remove one of its posts. A new in-app interface (to be rolled out from today) over the next few months will allow users to get a second say on the post, says Instagram's head of policy Karina Newton. A different Facebook moderator will review the post and restore its visibility if it has been wrongly removed and inform users of its conclusion in any way. Instagram always let users appeal account suspensions, but now someone can appeal a takedown if their post was mistakenly removed for nudity when they weren't nudity or hate speech that was actually friendly. Blocking vaccine hashtags On the disinformation front, Instagram will begin blocking vaccine-related hashtag pages when content appearing on a hashtag page features a large proportion of verifiably fake content about vaccines. If there is content that violates, but under that threshold, Instagram will block a hashtag in a top-only post, where no recent posts will be shown, to decrease the visibility of problematic content. Instagram says it will test this approach and expand it to other genres of problematic content if it works. Instagram will also be floating educational information through a pop-up to people seek vaccine content, similar to that used in the past for self-harm and opioid content. Instagram now says health agencies like the Center for Disease Control and the World The organization is confirming that vaccines do not cause autism, it is comfortable to declare contradictory information as verifiably false, and can be aggressively degraded on the platform. The automated system scans and punctuates all posts uploaded to Instagram, checking against banned content classifiers and what it calls banks that match the text. These collections of fingerprinted content that is already prohibited have their text indexed and words removed from images through optical character recognition so instagram can find posts with the same words later. Work is underway on expanding this technology to videos, and all systems are being trained to detect obvious issues such as threats, unwanted contact and insults, but also those that cause intentional fear of missing out, tuning in, shaming and betrayals. If AI trusts that a publication violates policies, it is reduced and counted as a strike against any labels included. If a hashtag is too high a percentage of content that violates, the tag will be blocked. If I had fewer strikes, it would close in superior only mode. The change comes after stern criticism from CNN and others about how hashtag pages like #VaccinesKill still featured tons of dangerous disinformation as recently as yesterday. Count-based suspensions Another new change announced this week is that Instagram will no longer determine whether to suspend an account based on the percentage of its policy-violating content, but by a total violation count in a certain period of time. Otherwise, Newton says. It would disproportionately benefit those who have a lot of sites, because even a large number of violations would be a smaller percentage than a rare violation by someone who doesn't post often. To prevent bad actors from soaring into the system, Instagram won't reveal the exact time period or the number of violations that trigger suspensions. Instagram recently announced on F8 several new tests on the security front, including a knot not to post a potentially hateful comment a user has written, away mode to take a break from Instagram without deleting their account and a way to manage interactions so they can prohibit people from taking certain actions such as commenting on their content or DMing without completely blocking them. The announcements come as Instagram has solidified its central place in youth culture. This means that it has an intense responsibility to protect its user base against bullying, hate speech, graphic content, drugs, disinformation and extremism. We work very closely with experts on issues, we raise issues that could playing differently on Instagram than Facebook, and we identify gaps where we need to change the way our policies are operated or our policies are changed, Newton says. OMHA is responsible for Level 3 claims appeals. The entry point of the appeals process depends on the part of the Medicare program covering the disputed benefit or whether the beneficiary is enrolled in a Medicare Advantage plan. There are five levels in the Medicare claims appeals process: Level 1: Your health plan. If you disagree with a Medicare coverage decision, you can apply for your health plan to re-determine your claim. Level 2: An independent organization. If you disagree with the Level 1 decision, you can request reconsideration by an independent organization. Level 3: Office of Medicare Hearings and Resources (OMHA). If you do not agree with the Level 2 decision or dismissal, you may request that a WHO adjudicator review the Level 4: The Medicare Appeals Council. If you disagree with the OMHA adjudicator's decision, you can request the Medicare Appeals Council review the decision. Level 5: Federal Court. If you disagree with the Medicare Appeals Council's decision, you can seek a review of your claim in federal District Court. If you were told you are not eligible for Medicare, see Guidance rights appeals. If you think part B Premium fare should be reduced, see Premium Appeals in Part B for guidance. In most cases, the decision is whether or not to cover a medical service or an item and how much the Medicare program will pay for the service or article. There are different names for these decisions based on the part of the Medicare program that covers benefits.
