When I received my first tattoo last year, I sifted through Google and looked through Instagram to find a well-judged tattoo artist who knows how to properly melanated my skin and showcase their work on diverse skin tones. Because the disturbing fact is, not any tattoo artist. Although people of color are deeply involved in tattoo history, the industry has long been shaped by racism and colorism, with many artists not training themselves on darker skin, ignoring tattoos on melanin-rich skin from their portfolios, or turning their backs on customers of color altogether. While many non-black tattoo artists have promoted this rhetoric that darker skin is harder to tattoo (especially with color), Atlanta-based tattoo artist Kandace Layne—who made his start as an assistant at the black-owned tattoo shop City of Ink—debunked this legendary flat out. City of Ink instilled in me that black people can get pretty much any color. That's just how you use those colors and how those colors play out together, Layne said. There are some colors you might want to be more strategic with, but the idea that people of color can't get colored tattoos is just a lie. Layne believes that the reason many white tattoo artists have refused to tattoo darker skin is associated with the idea of deletion. When you think about tattoos, you don't think about indigenous cultures but mostly tattoo starters. They are completely left out and it's not even like those cultures are dead. They're still here, Layne explains. So tattoos have made are whitewashed and brought into physical too where tattoo shops are segregated. Layne says in reference to stores that don't include black tattooists their employees. Layne currently works at the Queen Bee Tattoo Shop, an Atlanta studio that prioritizes diversity and inclusion in their hiring process. My boss's tattoo shop Queen Bee, Pain and Wonder, and Virtue and Vice all have employees of different ethnic backgrounds. This needs to become the norm. It makes customers feel more welcome. To start making the tattoo industry more inclusive, Layne believes there are a few things that non-black tattoo artists and shops need to do. She said the most immediate action they could take was to make their employees more diverse. Tattooers should aim to have diversity in their stores by hiring BIPOC and women. Sometimes that can mean hiring people who are tattooed in inappropriate environments or trying to learn on their own. They can try to help these artists, or hire bi poc that has been established, which has a lot. Layne added that the alliance between black and non-black tattoo artists could manifest in ways other than apprenticeships and recruitment. Show some support in any way you can. Even if you can't learn someone, if you see someone who needs help, contact them. Just do something, but you have to open your circle, Layne expressed. For people of color who want to tattoo, Layne understands the challenge of finding an artist you trust. But, she offers a bit of advice for black and brown people who want to get squid. Make sure you find an artist who has a style that you already like. You don't have to like everything on their page, but for the most part you should like everything they do and they should also have different skin tones on their page. Whether you're planning your first or your next tattoo, be sure to keep Layne's proposal in mind.
