I am talking about construction and management simulators, which for some years have been experiencing a revival thanks to Cities Skylines. There were sim everything: Sim City, Sim Copter, Sim Earth, Sim Ant, etc. However, these Maxis titles did not ride the crest of the wave for long. Several companies have tried to get their share in this profitable market, Microsoft is one of them. That attempt gave rise to Transport Tycoon, of which OpenTTD is an open source conversion launched for Android. This is basically a direct port of the classic PC game, with the same controls and the same need for a manual to check during early games. A vintage flavor in every way One of the things that will catch your attention if you are a nostalgic (like me) is that delicious retro aura that is throughout OpenTTD: menus, mouse pointer, graphics, colors, etc. If you weren't holding your mobile phone in your hand, you might think you're back in front of those old PCs with VGA cards that showed as many as 256 colors. However, that very retro flavor is also one of the biggest weaknesses in the game: it's not an intuitive game, players have to control too many variables and you always have to go back to the instruction manual. That said, once you can master the basics, it becomes an extremely fun and very enjoyable experience. Features Build a transport empire from your Android. Online multiplayer or against machine-generated opponents. Completely open source. Today is a good day. Today is the day everyone openttd.org services running on AWS. Today is the day when I can finally shut down our dedicated OVH server. Today is the day I can finally withdraw software like: Django 1.2 (released 2010) Debian Etch (released April 2007) MediaWiki 1.12.0 (released winter 2008) XenServer 6.5 (released January 2015) An IRC bot that has not been updated or restarted since This was the longest migration I've ever done: 11 months in disection. But in the end we did it! This was made mostly possible by receiving AWS Open Source credits. This allowed me to try AWS services, do stupid things (accumulate an invoice of over $500 per month.. which is HUGE for us), and all while knowing that it would not clean up our donation funds (read: credits covered all our costs for 2020). Unfortunately, in 2021 we will not receive AWS Open Source credits.. this means no longer experimenting. So a perfect time to write down what's happened in the last 16 years, and more specifically, in the last 2 years. This will be a long post, so buckle up! Find out more
