After I graduated from college in 2010, I worked an average of 70 hours a week as a janitor and a night clerk at a convenience store. After nine months of hard work, I had saved up enough money to move to Denver. I, along with hundreds of others, applied for a job at a start-up. Soon after, I learned the big news that I had got the job. I didn't get the job because I went to a great school or because I'm great with computers (I'm not) or because I was extraordinarily qualified compared to the other applicants. According to my boss, the deciding factor in my employment was that I speak fluently in the Spanish language. As a professional, knowing Spanish can help you achieve your goals, no matter what they are. In the United States, there are an estimated 35.5 million people aged five and older who speak Spanish at home, making it the second most spoken language in the country. From health care, to working in fast food, to traveling internationally and studying abroad, Spanish can be very useful. But learning it can be expensive, with many language programs like Rosetta Stone costing upwards of $500. If you don't have the money to shell out for school or language-learning software, don't worry – anyone can learn Spanish without having to spend hundreds or thousands of dollars. Ways to learn Spanish 1. Get out In most medium or large cities there are many opportunities to practice speaking Spanish with other people. Most people understand Spanish better than they can speak it, but practicing with other people will help your speaking skills enormously. Make use of sites like Meetup, where users can coordinate with people who share their interests — including learning Spanish. These meetings usually take place at a restaurant or a bar, and people of all levels of floating are welcome. In addition to enhancing your language skills, you are required to meet new and interesting people you would not normally encounter in your daily life. Listen to music After Shakira's cross-over album Laundry Service came out, I was hooked. I bought all her albums and listened to them all the time. After a while, I wanted to know what she was singing about, so I looked up her lyrics and read them while I listened to the music. I learned a lot of metaphors, as well as many idiomatic expressions that you just didn't find in textbooks. Studies have shown that music and songs help people retain information, so give Spanish-language music a try. If Shakira doesn't do it for you, find someone who does. If you are completely unfamiliar with Spanish music, go to the Latin Grammy website, where you can browse last year's winners and nominees, and explore musicians who play the genre of music you like. Once you've found an artist, you can go to Pandora Radio, create a station under their name, and discover similar musicians. 3. Surf the web There are a myriad of online resources to help you learn Spanish. For example, MyLanguageExchange.com allows you to connect to a Spanish speaker who wants to learn English. You and your partner spend half your time together speaking in Spanish and half speak in English, practicing with each other via video, chat and audio. Lesson plans are available to provide guidance. Notes in Spanish is another great source, with free videos and audio to any level. BBC Language Spanish also provides its users with a wealth of tools. These are just some of the many resources available. If none of these appeal to you, surf the web until you find a site that does. 4. Reading a book is a great way to promote your Spanish language skills. Many people recommend starting with children's books or young adult novels you've already read. While this method may work for many people, it doesn't work for me. I rarely read books twice, and while Harry Potter was pretty good the first time, I have no desire to visit el mundo de los magos again. I recommend reading something you haven't read before – you don't know what's going to happen, so you have extra incentive to continue. You can try a writer you know you like, but a title you don't yet have Of course you will you to stick to the basics – this technique works well with books by Dr. Seuss, Roald Dahl, John Grisham, or Danielle Steele, but not so much with Schopenhauer or Kant. Most libraries have a Spanish literature section (and language CDs). But if your local public library doesn't, you'll find many affordable books in Spanish on Amazon. Keep in mind that when you read, don't look up every word in a dictionary. It will slow you down and you will find yourself struggling to re-immers yourself in the plot. If you understand the general core of a paragraph, but not all the words, don't worry. Look up words only if they appear repeatedly and are essential to understanding the context. 5. Read a newspaper Picking up a Spanish-language newspaper allowing you to catch up on current events while improving your language skills. Most Spanish-language newspapers in the United States include both Spanish and English, so you have a handy reference if you get stuck. If your city doesn't have a Spanish-language publication, go online and read sources like Univision or CNN in Spanish. 6. See Telenovela's Soap Operas is a great way to learn a language, especially because of the ease with which you can follow the plot because of the visual. Check out your local cable or satellite TV provider for a guide to Spanish-language TV stations, or search online for sites that offer Spanish weather forecasts, sitcoms and news, as well as soap operas. 7. Listen to Podcasts or Radio Shows If you find yourself too busy to follow the twists and turns of a telenovela, maximize your commute time to work by soaking up some Spanish via podcast. Regardless of your level, there's something for everyone available - if you're a beginner, check out radio lingua network. For those who are more advanced, try BBC Mundo. Final word When you learn a new foreign language, failure is your best friend, so you'd better get it quick with it if you want to progress. Hard work and enthusiasm matter, of course, but if you want to succeed in learning Spanish, you have to put up with the fact that you will fight and you will make mistakes. You can turn to an older woman with the informal tú, or you can tell an absolute stranger you are madly in love with them. But it's much better to call chicken (pollo) dust (polvo) than to sit tight-lipped and not learn anything. Although you may often find yourself beetroot, you should know that language errors can help you grow personally. If you have driven, the enthusiasm and the commitment, you can easily learn Spanish without spending any money at all. Not only will your creativity and hard work make you more attractive to potential employers, but you will also meet some amazing people and learn about new cultures.
