Slime videos on youtube?

Karina Garcia explains how you can jump into the slime trend —and it's less messy than you think. Okay, it's probably not a verb, unless we talk about old-school nickelodeon thinning of celebrities. You might remember to do some in science class, but it's still crazy, with endless YouTube videos demonstrating how to get things done. When people first hear of slime, they're like, 'Why do you want to get your hands on this goop? It's so messy and disgusting, said Karina Garcia, YouTube's Queen Slime. It's not as sticky and messy as people think. So if you're ready to get your hands on a little sticky, but otherwise delicious slime, the slime queen walked us through how to make a great batch. Often old-school slime recipes used to order Borax, an ingredient in laundry detergent containing harsh chemicals. But you can easily make slime without Borax, dipping in other products in your bathroom. A good starter slime recipe is glue (like Elmer's), baking soda, and contact solution (a nice fluffy lime). You will use about half a teaspoon of baking soda and 1 teaspoon contact solution for each bottle of glue in the silt. But you can also make slime with shampoo or dish soap. Then you get into the fun stuff: colors, smells and accessories for fun playtime. And this is all about getting your hands on the goop and kneading it as a very colorful dough. RELATED: Teens Are Hoarding Borax && Glue to make slime - But is it safe? If the slime feels dry, add some water. If it's too liquid, add some cornstarch. But you probably want to use less water than you think. When you make homemade slime, it's supposed to be thick and stuff, Garcia explained. We don't want slime running through our hands. Coloring foods and essential oils are easy colors and aromas to add that you probably already have in your kitchen and bathroom cupboards. Scented shampoos or lotions will give you some pizzazz even without adding additional slime ingredients. But you can also go further and look for special smells. My favorite aromas are usually cherries or chocolate, anything sensible about bakery. Cupcakes and things like that. Bread! Bread slime. That smell. There's a smell of bread, it's like the French baguette and it smells so realistic, it's crazy. My overall favorite add-on for slime are pearls. Because you can only add a little to give it a semi-foam where it's crisp at the top, but bright enough at the bottom. And then there's like the full foam, where it adds a lot and it's super crisp. Before starting your slime, make sure everyone's hands are washed and the of the kitchen are clear. Cleaning time will be much easier with a spill-proof site. Pro tip: You can also use silt to pick up another slime, such as a slime eraser. The slimming limits are really only if you want to mix it in kitchen countertop or bathtub. Garcia goes wild with his slime. I usually like it over the top. Either it's like a really big slime, like making 100 pounds of it, or making like a giant stress ball full of slime, he said. Most of my slime videos are just a little more. RELATED: How to throw a DIY slime party While you can't normally eat slime (for obvious reasons), Garcia Craft City's company has just launched a slime that you can eat - a partnership with KoolAid to make blue raspberries and cherry slime. You can add sprinkles for some extra sensory fun to the edible type, but there are many more options for non-food. So if you want to follow the Queen's lead, don't limit your slime dreams. You can make fluffy slime with glue, shaving cream, baking soda, and contact solution. For some unicorn-style glossy slime, sprinkle in a little handmade glow at the end of your slime mixing process. Want to do the show on the road and send the kids on a play date with all the traps you need for slime? Put glue, shaving cream, , your chosen smells, and any complement for texture. Don't forget a sealable container so you can keep your slime for later! Karina Garcia explains how you can jump into the slime trend —and it's less messy than you think.
