For many organizations, mixed learning means transforming a one-media training program into a multimedia event. At Christensen/Roberts Solutions, this means much more: This means building a connected training net and workplace knowledge sources and performance tools. Learning that starts in the classroom extends to the workplace, where it can be used effectively. Learning becomes an ongoing process. Learning becomes an achievement. Blended learning is an effective option if learning takes some time in personal, learner-teacher settings, as well as continuous learning and confirmation at work. C/R Solutions has developed effective mixed learning programs to train and support different management and sales tasks, including performance management team development technology project management branch office management weather training sales at the executive level These blended learning solutions employ a wide range of elements including animated system presentations, action mazes, simulations (software and decision making), knowledge bases, knowledge sharing, performance support tools, classroom-based education, eLearning/web-based training, live and archived webcasts, video presentations, recorded slide presentations, and Flash animations. Sample Projects Copyright 2011 Christensen/Roberts Solutions A newly hired employee at the Public Works Department marveled at his supervisor when he painted four miles of yellow lines on the road on the first day. But the next day, he only painted two miles, and on the third, he painted only a mile. When asked why his productivity had dropped, he replied: The further I go down the road, the further away I get from the paint bucket. Most training events like paint buckets - they're ultimately useless if you can't get your knowledge with you back to work.
