Mcdonald' s number in california?

Think Payday loans are not out of control in the United States? Compare the number of payday lenders in your state against the number of McDonald's restaurants in your state. While California is the worst in terms of the sheer excess of payday lenders (see Green Column), more interesting are those states with massive per capita density of payday lenders (see Yellow Column). Most states awash with payday lenders have high percentages of poor and/or minority citizens, like Mississippi, Alabama, South Dakota and New Mexico. Politicians in these states are generally quite supportive of the payday lending industry. In many New England states, charging 300 to 1000+ % interest on a loan is still an offence. Georgia and North Carolina have recently outlawed payday loans, in part to protect military personnel in their states who, like poor people and minorities, are the preferred targets of payday lenders. Want proof? Map their locations and see where they set up shop. The map doesn't lie. Would you like to see a map of this tragic situation? Click here for the green column map below. However, some states have poor data, or no data, so estimates were gathered from newspaper accounts, or the payday loan industry itself. Some estimates may not be correct. The company usually refers to this as the original McDonald's, though it's not the first McDonald's restaurant, but the ninth; The first was opened by Richard and Maurice McDonald in San Bernardino, California in 1940, while the oldest McDonald's still made the third one in operation, in Downey, California, which opened in 1953. However, Des Plaines Restaurant marked the beginning of future CEO Kroc's partnership with the firm. It opened under the auspices of his franchising company McDonald Systems, Inc., which became McDonald's Corporation after Kroc bought the McDonald Brothers' stake in the firm. The actual restaurant was demolished in 1984, but McDonald's realized they had preserved a history, so they built a replica. With golden arches placed on a glass and metal, red and white tiled exterior, the building largely follows the original blueprint of the McDonald Brothers, which they introduced when they began franchising in 1953; A Phoenix, Arizona, restaurant was first built this way. Kroc Restaurant was the first McDonald's built in a cold climate, and was built to design some adaptations, including a basement and a furnace. McDonald's announced that the building will be torn down due to bar flooding of the site as early as the end of 2017.[3] Complete demolition ending in the middle McDonald's has decided to donate land to the city for the Hay Park area. [5][6] The entrance sign was original, inspired by the early cartoon mascot Speedee, representing the innovative Speedee service system, the Assembly Line production which the McDonald Brothers had launched in 1948. However, it was moved from its original location at the south end of the property. Sign claim we have sold over 10.0. The replica museum offered irregular summer hours and was often closed; Tours were made by appointment. Ground floor original Fry Watts, the milkshake multimixer (which Kroc had sold when he first encountered the San Bernardino McDonald's restaurant), Soda Barrel, and Grill, attended by a crew of male mannequins in 1950s uniforms. Visitors can walk through the back or see through the front order windows (there was no sit-down restaurant section in 1955). The basement has a collection of old ads, photos, and a video about McDonald's history. A new, modern McDonald's was built across the street and to the south, replacing a Howard Johnson restaurant (then round the ground). There are a half-dozen glass enclosed exhibits at this McDonald's array around the table, including red and white tiles from original restaurants and string ties worn by employees from the 1950s to the early 1970s. [7] [8] The Big Mac Museum Restaurant, another McDonald's Museum, opened on Aug. 23, 2007, in Irvine, Pennsylvania. a museum on Route 30 Lincoln is also present at the original McDonald's site in San Bernardino on U.S. Route 66 in California. It is a rebuild run by the owner of the Juan Polo chain and is not affiliated with McDonald's Corporation. [9] See also list of food and beverage museums references ^ McDonald's No. 1.
