The term 8D music, or 8D audio refers to the effect that some producers are using in the postproduction process. Essentially, 8D Audio sound is created when you add an automated panoramic effect from left to right to the final mix of a song. For the uninitiated, panning is the ability to distribute sound against different audio channels. Grab your normal headphones, have two physical channels: left and right. You can set the sound to the left or right or, you can choose a specific sound that will play with one or the other headset. With 8D audio, this rotating audio structure simulates the feeling of moving circles around your head, fully immersing yourself in the experience. In addition, a reverberation effect is also added to make it look like the audio is coming from a live concert. The 8D final audio result is similar to what you'd hear walking the streets with headphones on. The audio apparently comes from all directions and sources, which makes it feel more like an emotional and sensory experience than regular listening. For most people, 8D audio and 8D music are examples of futuristic technology that delves into our entertainment flow, but in reality, the basis of 8D the audio has been around for quite some time. Binaural audio is created by recording through multiple microphones that have been placed in the same orientation as our ears, creating a shape delay (or phase). This refers to the speed at which a single sound reaches these two microphones creates the illusion of directional audio once Back. The biggest to consider when it comes to 8D the music is that the recording process is identical to what is seen in regular studies. May 8, 2018 music producers instead manipulate the various stereo parts of a song, moving them within a 360-degree virtual space to create the illusion of physical movement. Actually, the '8D' in 8D the audio does not refer to 8 dimensions, it is probably closer to 8 directions. True audio engineers are likely to tell you to check 8D music as spatial sound or 3D audio.
