Cara setting equalizer headset bluetooth xiaomi

In the last few days, I have been testing two new Bluetooth headphones. At this point in the maturity of the Bluetooth headphone market I expected that there would not be much innovation or difference between the models, but surprisingly, the units are very different in their approach, comfort and ultimately usability. The Scala 700La Scala 700 Wireless Cardo is excellent for the on-the-go executive and my personal choice for Bluetooth headphones. The first unit I tested was cardo wireless's Scala 700. The 700 is an update to Thistle's popular Scala 500 Bluetooth headset and Thistle has, once again, delivered a top-notch unit. The list price is $69.95, about $40 on Amazon.com.Measuring about 1.5 inches, the Scala 700 is about 30% smaller than the 500 and fits comfortably into the ear using their incredibly moldable ear ring. Not enough can be said of this often overlooked point. For those who wear a Bluetooth headset all day, the headset must be comfortable and flexible, but the material must remain robust over time. I found that the 700 earpiece fits comfortably with the external ear canal, which brings sound closer together and seals ambient noise. Adjusting/disabling the volume of the headphones on the back is easy to use and the attachment/response/drop button on the side is just as convenient. The headphone system is limited to five parts: Bluetooth headset, ear ring, charger, USB charging cable and a case that also has a belt ring. Both the charger and charging cable connect directly to the headphones, eliminating the hardware failure that has plagued most headphone charging media. After the initial five-hour charge, the Scala 700 produces six hours of speaking time and at least three days of inactivity. In case the small device is out of place, it can be paginated by the receiver and will beep until you locate the unit and turn off the pager. It's great that the Scala 700 is comfortable, simple and easy to use, but sound clarity is the most important factor in an earpiece and here the Scala doesn't disappoint. Call tests subjective to using my cell and voip chat application produced excellent results for both the sender and the recipient. The wind filter on the Scala 700 is even better than the previous model, and I was able to chat next to a blowing air conditioner without obvious interference. The above features are evolutionary of the 500 series and stand out from the competition, but what really sets this model apart is the ability to pair with multiple devices. I know a lot of people who have a headset for their computer at the at home and for their mobile phone. Cardo acknowledges that you may have this issue and may want to use the same Bluetooth headset as you move from one location to another. Scale 700 supports up to 10 pairings and allows active exchange between the last two devices used. I found multiple pairing very useful when when from my mobile phone to a video chat program. All I did was disconnect the set from my cell and request a connection from my computer, it was simple and seamless, and that's how technology should be. I highly recommend this unit to anyone who uses more than one Bluetooth device or simply wants the most comfortable headset cycle available. Plantronics Discovery 655 I have been using Plantronics headphones in my office for years in both wired and wireless models. The sound quality is always excellent, and while the headphones are a bit expensive, I found them worth the money. Unfortunately, that's not the case with discovery 655. Available on the Plantronics website with a list price of $149.95, $84.99 on Amazon. This unit is a great idea that somehow wasn't quite running. To be honest, there are some very good things about this Bluetooth headset. The sound quality is worthy of the name Plantronics and the design of the headphones themselves is quite attractive. The inner headset that keeps the unit in place is a good idea and quite comfortable, but I wasn't able to get the unit to sit safely. If you use headphones in a car or other place where you are physically stationary, the unit remains safe, but in my subjective walking tests, I found that it melted and if I didn't pay attention, it would fall to the ground. Putting this thing back in my ear after hitting the sidewalk in New York City wasn't attractive. There is an optional attachment for ear rings, but it was not the main focus of the design and the hard plastic ring belies this fact. The Discovery 655 only produces 3.5 hours of speaking time, although there is an optional battery attachment to the case that can charge the headphones three times on an AAA battery. Plantronics says you can use it to get 10 hours off a charge, in other words, before you have to reconnect to the wall charger. But you still have to charge the unit in the battery. The case/charger has four pieces: the charging stand, the battery attachment, the USB attachment and the disc where you can connect the charger to the wall. The entire charger/transport stand is designed as a large pen with the idea of attaching it to the shirt pocket for storage. It vibrates to let her know that a call is coming, but of course this also drains the battery. Like I said, the pen is large, about the diameter of a nickel, and it's not something I'd carry around in my shirt pocket. My biggest problem is that there seem to be too many parts, and I tend to lose things with too many parts. In short, the Bluetooth Discovery 655 headset is good if you don't move much, you just need a few hours of speaking time and absolutely hate loops Did I miss something? Do you have feedback? Convenient ear design noise cancellation of multifunction button The overall experience with Logitech mobile Bluetooth headphones was of pleasure and relatively few drawbacks. The price of $99.95 is low compared to other headphones on the market, and the features you get make it a solid purchase despite the rare sound problem. Things Logitech might consider in the future development of these types of headphones include a car charger as part of the retail package, longer speaking times, and a better-positioned multifunction button. For those looking to improve quality wireless accessories for the wireless world, the Logitech mobile Bluetooth headset is definitely a solid start. Introduction Those looking one step ahead of the traditional hands-free driving experience involving a mobile phone and wired headset may be ready for the onset of Bluetooth wireless headphones. While you'll need a Bluetooth-compatible phone or add-on for your existing phone, it's worth checking out models like the new Logitech mobile Bluetooth headset. Logitech is a creative and well-heeled computer accessories company that has been publishing truly exceptional products for years. Best known for mice, trackballs, keyboards, and game controllers, Logitech recently began expanding many of their product lines to offer wireless Bluetooth capabilities, hoping to help their customers work and play safer and easier. One of their newest Bluetooth versions is the Logitech mobile Bluetooth headset, priced at around $99.95. Designed to be wirelessly paired with Bluetooth-compatible phones, the idea behind this product is to provide a true hands-free cellular experience while driving without having to sacrifice audio clarity. Logitech headphones, designed in style in a relatively small and compact way, are provided with a wireless audio connection clean enough to listen or talk. An intuitive multifunction button groups several important bases, and a flexible ear clip regulator allows the device to sit comfortably on most ears. Features and design The Logitech Mobile Bluetooth headset comes with a number of features that Logitech believes will help make this product easy to use. The main one of these is a multifunction button that, depending on the use can also turn power on or off, answer and end calls and sync the headphones with your phone. When not in use, the headphones are set standby to preserve battery life. Volume control during calls is handled through a '+' and '-' button for up and down, respectively. There is also an audio mute feature, which triggers a smart audible tone heard every two seconds to remind you of the current state of the speech. Logitech says the speaking time is seven hours with a rechargeable battery charge, which can be connecting the headphones again in a gray and oblong case that also acts as a charger. Those who need to know the current status of their phone will be able to control a multicolored LED light, which flashes at different speeds and intervals to indicate everything from use to low battery. The Logitech Bluetooth headset comes with a comfortable design behind the neck. The overall design of the headphones is compact and easy to carry, although it is a bit larger than comparable products from other manufacturers. A folding microphone arm can be adjusted at different angles for proximity to a person's mouth, while the button's adjustable clip ear design allows you to wear headphones on both ears. The slightly circular and well-built design makes the piece sit comfortably, while its sleek look and multi-gray colors don't make someone wear it look too much like a space explorer. Set up and use as with any Bluetooth device, the first thing to do is to establish a wireless partnership with another Bluetooth element. In the case of Logitech headphones, setting up with a compatible mobile phone is not an incredibly complex process. After reactivating headphone discovery mode, you do the same for your phone (the way you do it depends exactly on your phone model: the Sony T616 tested with headphones was just a few simple clicks on the menu). The two devices will then talk to each other and in a few moments they should be ready to use. When a call arrives, a ring is heard in the headset. Pressing the multifunction button will connect you, although trying to find it can be a bit frustrating since it is quite small. In tests under normal operating conditions (e.g. driving and discussion), Logitech headphones worked quite well. Most people on the other side said the voice quality was good, although many complained of a buzz and/or echo sound. However, it was not clear to us whether this was a condition of the Bluetooth connection of the headphones or normal cellular use. On the owner's side of things, the sound quality was loud and quite clear with only a few crackling once in a while. A advertised background noise cancellation feature worked as advertised, effectively blocking outside noise from a caller who was inside a noisy mall. Another claim made by Logitech of a maximum distance of 30 feet from the phone to the headphones before the signal withdrew was quite accurate. Tests showed that the signal was starting to become unstable around 15 or 20 with callers who have difficulty hearing. Conclusion The overall experience with the Logitech Mobile Bluetooth headset was of pleasure and relatively few drawbacks. The price of $99.95 is low compared to other headphones on the market, and the features you get make it a solid purchase despite the rare sound problem. Things Logitech may want to consider in future development these types of headphones include a car charger as part of the retail package, longer speaking times, and a better placed multifunction button. For those looking to improve quality wireless accessories for the wireless world, the Logitech mobile Bluetooth headset is definitely a solid start. Editors' recommendations Councils
