Copyright © 2020 InfoSpace Holdings, LLC, System1 Company Fear The Walking Dead may have spawned off the original series from AMC, but it doesn't have much in common with the comic adaptation. However, the Walking Dead panel at New York Comic-Con teased a potential connection that you may not have picked up. Could Nick become a Whisperer of the Walking Dead? Fear of character has some habits common to a rotten group of comics. At the beginning of the panel, moderator and comedian Jason Mantzoukas described the villains to the audience. They walk en masse among the dead, wearing human skin suits to blend in with walkers and go unnoticed. Before I could stop writing my notes that it described the behavior of La Colonia on Fear the Walking Dead, Kirkman made an off-hand, seemingly joking remark that they could have come from Mexico. Then, when asked point-blank if Nick was supposed to be a Whisperer, Kirkman replied no comment. Before giving that answer, Kirkman denied that he had ever discussed plans to connect The Walking Dead and The Walking Dead. I want to do it very much that no comment can mean just that. As Mantzoukas pointed out on the panel, the girl who asked the question hit us all. What if it didn't? How cool would it be to be a character who transcends being a villain? What if this hint has just been an open spin-off and we didn't even notice? It's a stretch, logistically - even if Madison's Southern roots have you theorizing that she is Rick Grimes' sister, or related to Andrea. While Fear the Walking Dead doesn't happen before The Walking Dead, it's not so much before. Fear pilot will take place just over a month before the Walking Dead pilot, according to the official AMC press release, and the time has passed for both shows every season since. If Nick walked down the east coast and made it to the 7th Century, he'd be able to get to the east coast. Still, it would be an impressive reveal, and a really neat way to make the TWD universe just a little smaller. Picture: Peter Iovino/AMC It's safe to say that the Walking Dead franchise is no longer the cultural force it was just a few years ago. Its third season of The Walking Dead was one of the most-watched shows on TV, but it has experienced an increasing drop in viewership since Season 6, its final season of Season 10, earning the lowest audience of all. Even worse, fading has been fear of the Walking Dead. Having premiered at the height of The Walking Dead's popularity, it initially debuted to a wide range of people. But since then, the series has lost viewers every year, with this year's sixth season averaging just 1.4 million viewers through its first six episodes. Given that Season 1 averaged 7.6 million viewers per episode, things are not trending well for the show. Could this be the end of the road? Not necessarily. The Walking Dead is set to end its 11th season in 2022, which may seem like bad news for Fear the Walking Dead, but may end up being good news. That's because AMC is showing no signs of closing the franchise completely, and is actually continuing to grow it. The network recently premiered another spinoff, The Walking Dead: World Beyond, which is even less popular than Fear the Walking Dead but has so far avoided cancellation. AMC is also planning at least two other spinoffs - an anthology series called Tales of the Walking Dead and a show after characters Daryl and Carol - in an even more possible way, according to Deadline. With all these new shows coming in the future, AMC might want to keep what will soon become its longest-running TWD series - Fear the Walking Dead - in the air for help in transitioning to its newest features. Another factor in Fear the Walking Dead's favor is that while the show is steadily losing viewers, it still ranks as AMC's most-watched scripted series after The Walking Dead, even besting critical darlings like Better Call Saul and Killing Eve. If the show had been canceled, it would likely accomplish a lot worse than it is now. So while the network has yet to announce when Fear the Walking Dead returns for Season 7, the odds are that the show's zombies will continue their reign of terror on AMC in the near future. Spoilers for fear of the Walking Dead. While Logan and Morgan fuel the drama of growing Fear the Walking Dead, Alicia experiences something she hasn't had in a very long time: an emotional response to a work of art. It's also not the first time survivors have encountered apocalyptic installations. If that's what crossover fans think is going on, Jadis could show up for Fear the Walking Dead. If all artists and art this season are a sign. Of course, we learn that if you read this you're still here the trees were painted by Wes, a lone passenger attacked by Logan in a previous episode. The paintings, which unfortunately are not Drake's reference due to the zombie apocalypse and all, inspire Alicia to gather the strength she needs to move on. At the end of the episode, he paints his tree with an inspiring message that tells him: Someone is gone until they are gone. There may be other wooden paintings. At the end of the episode, Wes smiles you're still here with a message that doesn't match the handwriting before. To be honest, it could have been left to his dead brother, not another mysterious graffiti-er. The kids that Alicia picked up were also skillfully stringing together zombieified body parts in a way that could be considered aesthetic. Journalist Althea, a storyteller, is also an artist. Little by little, Alicia collects quite a team of creative types. How did Jadis, formerly known as Anne, get into all this? The revelation in The Walking Dead that Jadis was part of a group that rode around in helicopters and named people as either A or B before kidnapping them messed with what we thought was his personal history. It's possible he was visiting Texas. Before the apocalypse, Anne was an art teacher who took her students to the Smithsonian. When society collapsed, he used supplies from the dump to express himself artistically and began to refer to himself as Jad. At one point, after leading a bunch of trash people named Scavengers in a Virginia trash can, he joined the same group that Isabelle belongs to Fear. There are actually some missing months in the Walking Dead between the time Rick first met the artist in the time they flew away with - months leading up to the start of the original series of Season 9, in fact, which also happens to be around when Fear Season 5 takes place. We know that some kind of cross is coming, and that Jadis / Anne likely to have an impact on it. When Anne radioed a helicopter (listen above) for her latest episode of the original series, Fear the Walking Dead characters can be heard at the other end - including Morgan, Alicia and the newly clean-shaven Dwight. They're somehow within range, and any clues as to how this is happening are valid. Fear of the Walking Dead is extraordinarily good at paying connections away: the number of times that beer has come to the rescue alone proves it. Any random encounter can prove useful later. Even if Jadis isn't associated with these artists yet, he may be sympathetic to them when and when they finally meet. Helicopter people are scary - much worse than Logan - and Alicia and Morgan's group are going to need any bargaining chip they can use. Wouldn't it be great if they were all involved in art, not violence? Trust the fear of the Walking Dead to earn up such a twist. Source: AMC's latest Fear the Walking Dead episode, So Close, Yet So Far, was a completely different title suggests. Actually, it was right on the mark. Juxtaposed with the pilot, the second episode jumped into action and detailed the imminent death of society - by the likes of ravenous people taking on persona zombies. (Although they still look quite harmless until you see the whites of their eyes, without life.) So close, yet so far, is a positive step forward for a series that has now shown that even season one is colorful - so obvious redness, bloodshed, we look forward to seeing. The episode begins with the pilot let go, although this week both Madison Clark (Kim Dickens) and Travis Manawa (Cliff Curtis) now believe their junkie son Nick (Frank Dillane). Manama begins to worry about his biological son Christopher (Lorenzo James Henrie), who hates him for his divorce from Liza (Elizabeth Rodriguez). Chris decides to ignore most of Travis' calls, even though he gets a young boy on the line calling Liza on the phone. Both Travis and Liza enter the apocalyptic L.A. environment, and find Chris filming a riot against the police that killed a sick African-American in the street. The riotous feeling ends when the police barricade all the protesters, out of fear the disease will spread. Travis, Eliza and Chris manage to escape by entering a barbershop, whose owner was in the process of lowering the metal gate in front of their shop. The hairdresser, Daniel Salazar (Ruben Blades), also has his family with him, inside his universal shop. This angle is close to an episode of the director, Adam Davison, and the writer, Marco Ramirez, making productive progress in characterizing Manawa's immediate, and previous, family. Travis looks through a narrow hole in the metal gate of the store to see the outside. Two mischievous teens even come on Gate. From this moment on, viewers can assume that Manawas and salazars are inextricably linked. Source: AMC On the other side of things, Madison Clark becomes separated from Travis and sets up to find medications that can prevent Nick from going cold turkey. Meanwhile, Nick grabs and almost dies at home without his fix. His sister Alicia (Alycia Debnam-Carey), happily sisters her brother back to life. Just before that, viewers also learned that Alicia's boyfriend Matt (Maestro Hammel) had come down with any illness - which takes place around - closing schools and knocking cities off the grid. Unselfishly, Matt tells Alicia to leave his house so he doesn't have any symptoms. When hunting for drugs, Madison goes to her workplace, a local high school, and finds this ghost town. No wonder, but someone shows up to give him fear. It turns out that someone is Tobias (Lincoln A. Castellanos), who returns to school to stock up on food in the cafeteria. So Tobias and Madison then run into real danger - Madison's former boss, turned zombie, Art Costa (Scott Lawrence). Costa almost kills Tobias before Madison saves the day with a fire extinguisher. Madison invites Tobias to ride through the storm with his family, but Tobias refuses, saying that this plague - whatever it is - is not just ending. Madison returns home with confiscated drugs to Nick. Luckily, Nick's at this point. Clarks, still at home, wave to his neighbors across the street and next door, but everything is now on the verge of a facet that is extremely action-free for fans. By the end of the episode, the same neighbors who once waved and hosted a birthday party were now eating each other alive. It's all really out of kilter, 21st century.
