The capital provided by a consortium of global investors, backed by Finitive, has enhanced Marketlend's ability to provide short-term credit facilities to SMEs in Australia. 30, 2020 /PRNewswire/ -- Finitive, a financial technology platform that provides institutional investors with direct access to private credit transactions, today announced that it has supported ongoing capital increases for Marketlend, a securitised lender platform that provides short-term credit facilities for small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) in Australia and Asia, by enabling investors to align with the underlying SME facilities. Sydney-based Marketlend secured more than AUD 200 million through a number of loan facilities from a consortium of investors, including banks, credit funds and other institutional investors from Australia, Asia and North America. Marketlend will use the capital to fund its leading purchase, now later pay Unlock product for Australian SME borrowers and Asian commercial credit transactions. Marketlend's commercial credit facilities are secured by a first-priority lien over the borrower's business and either by the borrower's receivables or inventories. The loans are insured against loss of thought by investment-grade insurance companies. Australian and Asian SMEs are having difficulty obtaining an extended loan for the purchase of supplies, especially in the current COVID-19 environment. Marketlend solves this continued need for credit facilities by creating insured securitisation structures for investors to extend loans directly to these companies, said Jon Barlow, founder and CEO of Finitive. We are very pleased to have partnered Marketlend with a global consortium of investors through the Finitive network. Leo Tyndall, CEO of Marketlend, said: Over the years we have worked with Finitive and his ability to introduce us to investors around the world has been instrumental in developing and expanding our platform. Unlock, our purchase now pays later for the business, has been supported by investors who provide the capital to enable its significant growth in the market, and that would not be possible if global investors participate in our platform. (Bloomberg) -- Chinese regulators ordered Jack Ma's online financial titan Ant Group Co. to return to its roots as a provider of payment services, threatening to boost growth in payment services. most lucrative transactions with consumer credit and asset management. The central bank summoned Ant executives over the weekend and told them to correct the company's credit, insurance and asset management services, the People's Bank of China said in a statement on Sunday. While it stopped briefly, immediately after a The central bank stressed that Ant needed to understand the need to revise its business and to provide a timetable as soon as possible. The series of edicts poses a serious threat to the expansion of Ma's online financial empire, which has rapidly evolved over the past 17 years from a PayPal-like operation to a full range of services. Before regulators intervened, Ant was ready for a stock market listing that would have valued him at more than 300 billion dollars. The Hangzhou-based company must now move forward with the creation of its own financial holding company to ensure it has sufficient capital and protect personal private data, the central bank said. This is the culmination of a series of regulations and sets the direction for Ant's business, said Zhang Xiaoxi, an analyst at Gavekal Dragonomics in Beijing. We have not yet seen any clear signs of separation. Ant is a huge player in the world and any separation has to be careful. The authorities also blasted Ant for underperforming corporate governance, contempt for regulatory requirements and the obligation to provide regulatory arbitrage. The central bank said Ant had used its dominance to exclude rivals, harming the interests of its hundreds of millions of consumers. China stepped up its investigation into the two pillars of billionaire Ma's internet domain last week when it also launched an investigation into alleged monopolistic practices at Ant subsidiary Alibaba Group Holding Ltd. The e-commerce company's U.S.-listed shares plunged the most in the news of the probe. The State Market Supervisory Authority sent investigators to Alibaba on Thursday, and the on-the-spot investigation was completed that day, according to a Zhejiang Daily report released Saturday. The report cited an unnamed official from the local market regulator in Zhejiang province, where Alibaba is based. Ant said in a statement Sunday that a special team will be formed to prepare proposals and a timetable for a review. It will maintain business operations for users and leave costs for consumers and financial partners unchanged, while strengthening risk control. The pressure on Ma is central to broader efforts to contain an increasingly influential Internet sphere. Once hailed as a driver of economic prosperity and a symbol of the country's technological competence, the empires built by Ma, tencent Holdings Ltd.'s Chairman, Pony Ma Huateng, and other tycoons are now under after amassing hundreds of millions of users and gaining influence on almost every aspect of daily life in China. Alibaba Chief Executive Officer Daniel Zhang said in a meeting with local regulators on Friday that the company will only thrive in the future by complying with the rules, the state-backed China News Service reported. Ant's top executives are part of a task force that already talks to watchdogs almost daily. Meanwhile, regulators, including the China Banking and Insurance Regulatory Commission, are weighing which companies should give up control over the risks they pose to the economy, officials familiar with the matter said. They have not decided whether to split their various lines, split their online and offline services, or go any other way. Here are 17 tips on how to make the right financial decisions during a difficult recovery. How much do you get - and when? And what about President Trump's Trump's -- It's definitely been a tough year. But 2020 was a wonderful time for Bitcoin. The cryptocurrency nearly quadrupled, surpassing 20,000 US dollars for the first time as it set a record for record. The Diehards hailed it as inflation hedgein in an era of unprecedented central bank generosity. Wall Street veterans from Paul Tudor Jones to Stanley Druckenmiller blessed it as alternative samanes and added to the rally. And companies like MicroStrategy Inc. and Square Inc. moved cash reserves in crypto in search of better returns than near zero interest rates deliver. Although none of these reasons for buying Bitcoin with its origins as an alternative to fiat currencies, they point to a growing acceptance of crypto as its own asset class. And that has the jealous community, which, in its quest for legitimacy, is taking another lap of victory. What's happening now -- and it's happening faster than anyone could have imagined -- is that bitcoin is moving from an esoteric fringe value to the mainstream, said Matt Hougan, chief investment officer of Bitwise Asset Management. When it becomes mainstream, there's just so much money on the sidelines that needs to come and set a position that makes me very bullish for 2021. But with bitcoin attracting more attention, it could also get more control from regulators, says Guy Hirsch, managing director for the US at online trading platform eToro. Despite this meteoric rise, some storm clouds are on the horizon, he said, including the aftermath of several last-minute actions by the outgoing Trump administration. Devotees say that in some ways, the pandemic-devastated year proved to be the perfect environment for the digital coin. Warnings of rampant monetary pressure from global central banks -- some of which began to reveal their own interests in digital assets -- stoked fears of potential inflation as interest rates fell to low swells. This has led some investors to chase yields and hedge with cryptocurrencies, pushing their price above '7,200 at the beginning of January. Many left the coin for dead after their 2017 rally crashed the following year, a time track sometimes referred to as cryptowinter. But it has risen by more than 300% in 2020, and many investors say it could continue to grow next year. A survey by Deutsche Bank found that a majority of respondents see it as higher in 2021: 41% of participants project a target of between 20,000 and 49,999 U.S. dollars and 12% because they are above 100,000 U.S. dollars, according to Jim Reid, a strategist at the company. Previous: Ministry of Finance proposes crackdown Virtual-Currency Transfers beforeWhat else is on the radar? For Meltem Demirors, Chief Strategy Officer at digital asset manager CoinShares, there are some concerns, concerns about Joe Biden's administration could mean for the crypto space. In general, I think we've had challenges with the Dems -- they prefer more regulation, more oversight, Demirors said. I am a little concerned about the direction in which things are going, especially because of antitrust lawsuits and an erosion of Internet data protection. Still, the industry has some allies, said Demirors, including Patrick McHenry of North Carolina and Warren Davidson of Ohio, who they say is committed to protecting consumers' financial privacy. In the future, many strategists and investors say, the industry could see more control and tighter regulation with Biden in the White House. Janet Yellen, who was nominated as finance minister in Biden's administration, has warned investors about bitcoin in recent years, saying it is a highly speculative asset, not a stable store of value. A representative did not immediately return a request for comment. Meanwhile, Bloomberg News reported that Gary Gensler could be nominated to the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission to succeed Jay Clayton. Clayton's exit from the regulator is welcome news for crypto fans who have taken a hard line over the years by trying to stop initial coin offerings, rejecting applications for bitcoin exchange funds, and launching a last-minute lawsuit against Ripple Labs Inc. Gensler, who served as chairman of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission during the Obama administration, a senior adviser to MIT Media Lab Digital Currency Initiative. According to eToro, there is uncertainty about how the Biden administration will approach cryptocurrencies, but the appointments are notable because Yellen is notoriously anti-crypto and Gensler is known to be pro-crypto. Without knowing how the authorities will try to regulate crypto more robustly in the coming years, it is difficult for markets to continue to grow at the same rate as they are now, especially when, as some fear, regulations are enacted aimed at curbing innovation rather than encouraging it, Hirsch said. Once again, clarity is the name of the game. (Bloomberg) -- Two months ago, global investors were on the verge of moving away from the world's largest IPO. Now the returns of the hundreds of millions of dollars invested with Ant Group Co. are in jeopardy. China ordered Ant to re-examine its fintech businesses -- from asset management to consumer credit and insurance -- and return to its roots as a payment service. While the central bank's statement on Sunday was little concrete, it poses a serious threat to the growth and most lucrative business of billionaire Jack Ma's online financial empire. Regulators were on the verge of asking directly for the company to be dissolved, but stressed the importance of understanding the need to overhaul its business and urged it to come up with a plan and timetable as soon as possible. The authorities also slammed Ant for underperforming corporate governance, contempt for regulatory requirements, and the obligation to use regulatory arbitrage. The central bank said Ant had used its dominance to exclude rivals, harming the interests of its hundreds of millions of consumers. Ant said it would set up a dedicated team to meet regulators' demands. It will maintain business operations for users and will encourage them not to increase prices for consumers and financial partners, while strengthening risk controls. The Hangzhou-based company must set up its own financial holding company to comply with the rules and ensure it has sufficient capital, regulators added. Here are some of the scenarios from investors and analysts on what the restructuring might look like:MildOptimists say that regulators are merely reasserting their right to oversee the country's financial sector and sending a warning to Internet companies without the intentions of drastic changes. Beijing could try to make an example of Mas Ameis, the largest among a number of new but ubiquitous Past raids of this kind have dealt short-term blows to companies, leaving them largely unscathed. Social media giant Tencent Holdings Ltd., for example, became a prominent target in 2018 in a campaign to combat child gambling addiction. While its shares took a hit, they eventually recovered to all-time highs. Ant's subsidiary, Alibaba Group Holding Ltd., has, after a short-term short-term from authorities above all, from unfair pressure on traders to turn a blind eye to counterfeits on its e-commerce platform. I don't think regulators are thinking of disbanding Ant because no fintech company in China has monopoly status, said Zhang Kai, an analyst at market research firm Analysys Ltd. The law not only targets Ant, but also sends a warning to other Chinese fintech companies. Some see this as an opportunity for Ant. With the industry as a whole facing tighter oversight, Ant has more resources to address the challenges as an industry leader, Zhang said. This would complicate the shareholder structure and harm the company's fastest-growing companies. Ant was valued at around USD 315 billion prior to the IPO and has made investments from the world's largest funds. Among them: Warburg Pincus LLC, Carlyle Group Inc., Silver Lake Management LLC, Temasek Holdings Pte and GIC Pte.Global investors supported the company when it was valued at approximately USD 150 billion in its last fundraising round in 2018. A split would make the return on their investments uncertain, and the timetable for an IPO due in November is now being pushed into the distant future. The government could ask Ant to spin off its more lucrative operations in fund management, credit and insurance, and turn them into a financial holding company that will face tougher scrutiny. The emerging reality is that China's regulators are introducing similar regulations against banks and fintech players, says Michael Norris, research and strategy manager at Shanghai-based consulting firm AgencyChina. While the service handled 17 trillion U.S. dollars in transactions in a year, online payments were largely loss-making. The two largest mobile operators, Ant and Tencent, have heavily subsidised the companies and used them as a gateway to attract users. To make money, they used payment services to sell products such as asset management and credit. Ant's growth potential is capped, with the focus refocusing on its payment services, said Chen Shujin, China financial research director at Jefferies Financial Group Inc. On the mainland, the online payment industry is saturated, and Ant's market share has almost reached its limits. NightmareThe worst-case scenario would be for Ant to give up its money management, credit and insurance business and to enter its operations in the which would serve half a billion people. His wealth management business, which includes the Yu'ebao platform, which sells mutual funds and MMFs, accounted for 15% of sales. Credit Tech, which owns Ant's Huabei and Jiebei shares, was the biggest revenue for the group contributing 39% of the total in the first six months of this year. It granted loans to some 500 million people. This result would be underpinned by the notion that China's leaders have grown frustrated with the swindle of tech billionaires and want to teach them a lesson by defunding their businesses -- even if that means short-term pain for the economy and markets. China's private sector has had a delicate relationship with the Communist Party for decades, and has only recently been recognized as central to the country's future. Many commentators have attributed the recent crackdown on fintech companies to comments made by Ma. at a conference in October, when he called attempts to rein in the burgeoning field short-sighted and outdated. Between them, Alibaba, Ant and Tencent had a market capitalization of nearly 2 trillion dollars in November, surpassing state giants such as Bank of China Ltd. as the country's most valuable company. The trio has invested billions of dollars in hundreds of emerging mobile and Internet companies, gaining kingmaker status in the world's largest smartphone and Internet market. The Communist Party is the end and the be-all and end in China. It controls everything, says Alex Capri, a Singapore-based research fellow at the Hinrich Foundation. There is nothing that the Chinese Communist Party does not control, and anything that seems to be circling out of its orbit in any way will be withdrawn very quickly, he said, adding: We can expect to see more of it.
