Normally, we had students come to the store. I have five studios and four other teachers who are each with us, but right now they're all teaching from home, says Rick Williams, owner of Running Dogs Music at Broken Arrow. Their music lessons became virtual instead of face-to-face after COVID-19 restrictions to follow social disengagement guidelines. The store celebrated its opening on March 2, and Days later, it had to close. Right now we're operating at a capacity of about 60%. A lot of people didn't want to do the online thing, held their place, says Williams. He teaches all levels of stringed instruments, including guitar, ukulele, mandolin and bengio. Williams began teaching in 1988 with the Tulsa Guitar House for 27 years, then went on to rent a place in Bishlin Banjo for five years before opening Running Dogs Music. I didn't anticipate an epidemic with everything I thought about trying to open a store, williams adds, we just started when we were shut down. The need to adapt to times and lessons online, he shares, comes with some challenges. It's not useful with the internet, there's always a delay, so you can't play back and forth, and that's part of what we're trying to do not just teach the instrument. We try to teach people how to be musicians, explains Williams. It's also a new way to learn for students like Tom Tetro, who plays the banja. It's a little harder, you need to stop and go. We both need to pay more attention because a lot of it is finger work, tetro says.Yet he finds himself pushing further, especially with the safer order at home. I have something I'm supposed to do to be ready for our next lesson, tetro says.Despite the temporary setback, both students and teachers are happy to share their passion and make music, until they can see each other again in person. Williams thanks for the community's support in these difficult times. I hope we start over when this is all over, says Williams, my students and the people who have supported us over the years have been just very phenomenal in trying to buy things from us and do everything they can to make sure we stay on the surface of the water. Running Dogs Music also offers a patch on the device's sidewalk in addition to the virtual classes. It is located in a strip mall at 1169 S. Aspen Ave., Broken Arrow.
