Amtrak will now allow customers to see how the whole trains are when they are booking online and through the mobile app, the company has shared with Travel + Leisure. The new update will give customers the percentage of seats they have booked in real time and choose their train accordingly. The percentage shown is based on full train capacity, an Amtrak spokeswoman told T+L, and while the company currently limited bookings due to the COVID-19 epidemic, the spokesman was unable to specify what Trains are currently capped, adding they vary by train. Health and safety, we continue to provide customers with new, innovative measures that promote physical removal and contactless travel, Amtrak President and CEO Bill Flynn told T+L in a statement. We have studied, analyzed, and improved amtrak travel experience — from start to end — to the safety and health of our workforce and travelers. When booking, solo travelers will typically get an empty seat next to them, while those who are traveling together can get seats next to each other, the company said. The update follows several initiatives the company has taken to promote safe travel during the epidemic, including employees and customers wearing face masks and equipping trains with onboard filtration systems. In August, Amtrak Acela started allowing business class customers to promote social distancing and allow customers to feel safe while on board an attempt to reserve seating in advance at no additional cost. Amtrak also offers private rooms and roomettes, giving passengers the option to limit their contact with others while enjoying the chance to take in a slow scenery from the flight — and the opportunity to visit several national parks in the process.
