The Vikings are 35-15 at home under Zimmer, a .700 winning percentage that is the fifth-best in the NFL since 2014. That home record should go well against a non-conference schedule filled with teams that struggled along the way last season. Minnesota will have to protect its home-field advantage, too, because the road schedule is harder than usual. The Vikings have four road games against teams that won 10 or more games last season. MORE: Schedule strength for all 32 teams in 2020Seventon of the schedule and prediction Minnesota opponents combined for a record 131-123-2 (.516) last season, meaning the Vikings will face the 10th toughest schedule per record. Twelve games are against teams that won seven or more games last season, meaning the vikes will have fewer breaks in their schedule. Toughest tests: Green Bay, New Orleans and Houston combined for a 20-7 home record last season, and the Vikings must play all three along the way. It won't be easy going against Aaron Rodgers, Drew Brees and Deshaun Watson, but these aren't the only road tests. Minnesota also travels to Tampa Bay, Seattle and Indianapolis. That means Tom Brady, Russell Wilson and Philip Rivers also on the road. Cousins went 4-4 as a starter on the road last season, though his home and road divisions are not that different. Biggest breaks: Dallas, Jacksonville, Atlanta and Carolina combined for a 12-19 record on the road last season, and this is a group Minnesota should be able to take advantage of given its success at U.S. Bank Stadium. In few minutes: Minnesota is making the playoffs every two years under Zimmer, and that's partially because of an 18-17-1 record in the NFC North in that stretch. Rivalry with the Packers and Bears looms large, and the Lions cannot be taken for granted. Minnesota enjoyed a fantastic NFL draft, and that depth should make a difference in these black and white games. It's a head knock with the Packers for the division; it comes down to how Minnesota fares in tough road contests. Can Cousins go 4-4 again? Record prediction: 10-6 6/59 Marlon Mack Marlon Mack led the Colts' ground attack in 2019, totaling 1,091 rushing yards and eight touchdowns on 247 carries. Phelan M.
