Over the years, we've shared tons of tips to stay safe and healthy in an emergency. Here are some of our favorite clever survival tricks. Well, these hacks are not limited to zombie-related emergencies, but to be honest, it is inevitable that one disaster we know of. Regardless of the emergency at hand, these tips can live on in the event of a disaster. A strong knot that knows your knot can help you carry supplies, save lives, tie zombies to trees, and do countless other things. If you only know one knot, you can learn the easy-to-tie bowline (even if you close your eyes), be strong enough to hold the roughest creatures, and undo them in about 10 seconds if you know how. Of course, having a wallet-sized cheat sheet with a few other knots never hurt. Tugboat bowlines, fisherman's knots, seat bends. The best knots are named for their work on. Read more9. Try not to drown: Zombies may not be very good swimmers, but they can't drown. We humans are not so lucky. If you learn to recognize the signs of drowning so that you can save others when the time comes and make it into the cold winter months, you will definitely want to know how to survive the fall through the ice. And, of course, if you're making a quick getaway and end up in the lake, here's how to get out of a sinking car. G/O Media might get commission Cubii Pro underdes query petical splashes, shouts and struggles for life, everyone knows it's the drowning one. Read more8. It may curse the popularity of the Prius, which turns a hybrid car into a generator, but when the world is so tired and in need of electricity, you'll be happy to put them up. With a simple inverter, you can keep your Prius warm, revive your phone, or turn your Taser into a long-term generator that keeps it fully charged. Photo: Beth and Christian Bell. Move to the last remaining human city where you find your way without a compass (there's always the last remaining human city), you need to keep your bearings. Even if you don't have a compass, you can still find the true north with a stick on the ground. You can also use your watch or make an improvised compass from duct tape and cork. Wikihau has a collection of methods for finding the true north without a compass. Read more6. Stick to rooftop lesson 1 to stay alive during the apocalypse: Keep your mobile and go where zombies can't. You don't have to be Spider-Man to jump from rooftop to rooftop. Just make sure you stick to the landing and you can use it to get around when the planet is overrun by the undead. Photo: JB London. You don't have to jump from rooftop to rooftop, but doing so will help you knowmore5. We all know that we should have a number on your phone in case of emergency as we keep in touch with other survivors, but technology gives us a lot of opportunities. You can use Google Voice to dial multiple family members at once, or use a service like I OK to quickly notify a group of people who have navigated through the latest disasters. In the worst case, the whole document in an emergency is a good idea because you want to make sure that a loved one can find your important information. I've avoided going down the terrorism tip route. Read more4. Know emergency first aid When someone is injured, you don't need a first aid kit around to help them. Cayenne pepper can quickly stop large cuts from bleeding and you can make emergency bandages from tree fungus. However, it will help you get to know some first aid tricks, so it's a good thing to read the ship captain's medical guide for non-doctors and get to know some of the biggest first aid myths that don't do you any good. Of course, none of these are a problem if your teammates have already been bitten by zombies, but due to normal injuries, some good first aid skills can save lives. If you're cut yourself but don't have a bandage nearby, says clinical nutritionist Stefan Doland read Read 3. Start a fire with anything when you need to stay warm as night falls, you need an easy way to start a fire. You can make an emergency fire starter from a T-shirt, or if you don't want to waste your clothes, some egg cartons and dried lint. Of course, you can also make more stove-like buddy burners from trash cans, soda cans and alcohol, or make lamps from tuna cans and leashes. It's important to have a backup plan in the big outdoors. An extra pair of clean underwear. Read more 2. Feed zombies for food and water will have a very rich food source, we will not be so lucky. When breeding through the wilderness, you need to breed your own food, and you need to separate edible plants from the harmful ones. Keep an eye out for safely eaten mushrooms and non-toxic berries. You can catch some fish in the soda can tab and even drink dirty water with a leash, bottle or lighter. Photo: Dominic Awwes. The tips above to put together a survival kit will get you, but the people who last the longest during the apocalypse will be the ones who had plans. Make sure your home is an emergency response with a 72-hour disaster kit, and when it's time to hit the road, make sure you can fit some survival items into your Altoidszu or old watch. It may seem like a waste of time now, but when disasters happen, your life is less stressful. If you don't have enough emergency kits in your house, here's a way to put one together, so you're reading more, so have you got your own great survival tips, zombie-related or anything else? In the 2020 Infospace Holdings, LLC and System1 company © Copyright is calculated through research assignments that your university was not cool enough to give you. Physics students at the University of Leicester in England have published a real-life study of how the zombie apocalypse affects the human population and how long it takes for anyone to simply run in fear and then say brain, brain, brain. The results were published in the school's peer-reviewed faculty publication, the Journal of Physics Special Topics. Special Topics, indeed. As the first of two studies has shown, most of us would wind up a kiss when faced with the viral zombie epidemicGoodbye to humanity, with 273 survivors scanned around the world, compared to millions of zombies just 100 days later. The students assumed that each zombie could find one person a day, and there was a 90% chance of infecting its victims. Advertising Students used the SIR model, an epidemiological model used to describe the spread of disease in populations, to calculate sober findings. The three categories of people/zombies are described by the program: susceptible (those who are still at risk of infection), infected people, and dead/recovery. (SIR is vulnerable, infected, and short to recover from.) The first study assumed humans to be helpless, but the follow-up gave us some additional moxie. Subsequent studies applied new parameters to the SIR model, such as learning how humans can create new babies and fend off and kill zombies. Interestingly, we actually find that it is possible for our population to survive the zombie epidemic under these conditions. We also find that when the zombie population is wiped out in about 103 days (1,000 days or about 3 years), the population begins to recover in 104 days (10,000 days or about 27 years), the researchers wrote. The whole point of such a paper is that students show off their creative side and apply some of the physics they know to the strange, wonderful, or everyday. Leicester physics professor Marvin Roy said in a press release. But some take the zombie apocalypse scenario a little more seriously. Gunnard Engebres and his Madison, Wisconsin-area friends are determined to be part of the re-emergence of humanity that has already developed a plan and assigned supplies and responsibilities. They devised this with the Mickys, a local watering hole that would be the site of their defense. When the zombie apocalypse hits here, it's our plan: grab your backpack with tools, food and clothes to fit. I am also tasked with bringing my solar panels and electrical equipment to start setting up spare power options, he explains in an email. Using a nearby canal, they set up a small hydroelectric plant after strengthening the facility from unwanted brain-eating intruders. They also came up with a way to grow crops of property, purify the water and communicate with cleaning parties as they roamed the area in search of supplies. So far, the SIR model has not been adopted to figure out what happens when the Engiebreth clan faces a real crisis before the zombies are eradicated: they run out of beer. Perhaps a third study is guaranteed?
