Car engine performance monitoring system

In the Engine Performance section, learn about horsepower, caries, the difference between turbochargers and turbochargers, and even how nitrous oxide boosts engine performance. Car engines are classified in different ways, including the number of cylinders, fuel type and cylinder layout. While the engines differ in manufacturer and design, the basic types remain the same. There are two main types of fuel used in car engines: petrol and diesel. These also classify the type of ignition in the engine as well. More recent alternatives to gasoline and diesel include electricity, ethanol, methanol, hydrogen, propane and natural gas. The cylinders of a car engine are arranged in two different ways: built-in or V. An integrated engine indicates that the cylinders are arranged in a series. The V layout is two series of cylinders side by side that form a V-shape. The number of cylinders also determines the amount of power produced by the engine. For example, a six-cylinder engine is more powerful than a four-cylinder engine. The type of ignition of an engine is related to how the fuel is ignited inside the engine. The fuel is either ignited by a spark plug or ignited by air compression until the temperature reaches the ignition. Gasoline engines use spark ignition, while diesel engines are compression-ignited. Without a cooling system, car engines will be quickly destroyed due to extreme temperatures. The car's engines are either wet or air-cooled. Liquid-cooled engines are the modern industrial standard and are cooled by a water pump that circulates water throughout the engine.
