Photo credit: OShuma/Shutterstock.com. The national flag of Switzerland is a red square flag with a white cross in the center. It is one of the most important national symbols of the country. The national flag is one of the most recognizable flags in the world as it closely resembles the official flag of the International Committee of the Red Cross. While the Swiss Constitution of 1848 does not provide for the establishment of an official flag, Switzerland officially adopted the flag as the official flag of the nation in 1889 as a directive of the Federal Council. Description Of the national flag of Switzerland The national flag of Switzerland is one of the two official flags of sovereign states in the world that have a square design. However, the civil ensign of the flag, which is used by Swiss non-governmental organisations and ships, has a rectangular design with the length of the width 2:3. The national flag is a red square (ratios of 1:1) that has a white cross in the center. The four arms of the cross are of equal length and do not extend to the edges of the flag. The shades of two colors on the flag (white and red) are not explicitly defined in Swiss law, and therefore for many years, institutions would use different shades of colors. However, a guide from the Federal Chancellery published in 2007 provided that the white must have a hexadecimal value of #FF0000, while red should have a hexadecimal value of #F00000. History of the Swiss national flag One must dive into the history of the Swiss flag to know the meaning behind the colors and symbols found in the national flag. The history of the Swiss national flag goes back to the Middle Ages. Historians believe that the white cross on the flag originated during the Battle of Laupen of 1339 when troops of the Old Swiss Confederation, an early confederation made up of small states that were a forerunner of modern Switzerland. The white flag was used because it was the flag of Habsburg and contrasts that of Burgundy and Maximillian I. The white flag was later adopted as the official identification of the Old Swiss Confederation and displayed during the Battle of Arbedo of 1422 and the Battle of Nancy of 1477. However, even before the Battle of Laupen, the Schwyz region of the Old Swiss Confederation already had its official flag which was a solid red flag after the region was awarded directness in 1240. Schwyz supported the conquest of King Rudolf of Habsburg against Burgundy, and in return king Schwyz granted permission to represent the cross on his flag, the first time in Swiss history. Meaning of the symbols and colors of the national flag of Switzerland The Swiss constitution does not mean the colors and symbols of the national flag of Switzerland, but there are several theories in the country that testify to the meaning of these colors and symbols. A common explanation is that the Swiss Cross is used as a representation of Switzerland's characteristic neutrality during global conflicts and wars (the country has not participated in international wars for centuries). A historical statement has it that the white cross was a representation of a Patenmedallie cast offered to Princess Claude of France in 1547 by Hans Jakob Stampfer as a baptismal gift.
