Those who upgraded to Windows 10 for free during the first year of launch will be able to delete and restore their devices later and maintain the free operating system, Gabe Aul, general manager of engineering for Microsoft's operating system group, said in a tweet that those who upgraded their devices to Windows 10 in between. A year of its existence will be able to perform a clean installation of Windows 10 on the same device at all times. It's good news for the upgraders who are concerned about what will happen to their devices a year after the July 29 launch. In addition, people don't need to hold a Windows 7 or Windows 8.1 product key to restore it. Their device will activate itself again after being upgraded to Windows 10, Aul said. That function is supported by the Windows 10 feature that will allow people to reinstall the operating system and store their files, or delete all files and restart, Aul goes on to say that the same agreement applies to people who restore from .iso disk image files instead of built-in reset services. However, those planning to upgrade critical hardware to their computer may still want to do so before they are released. Windows 10 still has questions about how Microsoft's upgrade policy will be generous and whether the same activation will apply to critical upgraded devices such as new motherboards. It is not yet known how much Microsoft will charge for the upgrade license to Windows 10 after the campaign period expires. Getting a new license with the software will be costly though: The Windows 10 Home retailer for $119, while the pro operating system will cost $199, the new version of Microsoft's licensed upgrade policy makes sense not only from a customer service perspective, but also because the company wants to get as many people as possible on Windows 10, Windows Chief Terry Myerson told the audience at the company's Build Developers conference in April that Microsoft needs 1 billion devices that use Windows 10 by the end of fiscal 2018.
