Bubble tea creation girl games online

Bubble tea, also known as boba tea or pearl tea, is a popular drink in Southeast Asia that gets a following in the United States. The comparative lack of competition in that market right now means there's potential for building a thriving business. The key to selling the sugary beverage flavored with fruit and with cold pearls from tapioca is educate potential customers so they can't wait to stop in every time they see your store. Since bubble tea has been relatively new to the U.S. market, using your store décor to help customers understand where bubble tea originates can boost awareness. For example, use bamboo furniture and pot ferns to create a more Asian or tropical feel. Hang signs and provide information at the counter on what goes into a bubble tea drink, such as the types of tea or the tapioca added to each drink. Explain that the tapioca looks like bubbles. When the drink is shaken, foam appears on top and the tapioca bubbles sink, giving the drink a bubbling look on top and at the bottom. The equipment requirements for making bubble tea are minimal. You'll need a refrigerator to keep ingredients cold, a stove for making tapioca and a way to crush ice if you choose to make your own rather than buy them. You also need mixers and shake cups to create the bubbles for which the drink is known. Condensed or sweetened milk and fresh fruit will also be necessary if you plan to make bubble smoothies. Get cups in various sizes and buy fat straws for sucking the tapioca off the bottom of the beverage. Business kits with bags of flavored powders, tapioca, tea, fat straws and bespoked kicks are available. Boba tea stores charge an average of between $3 and $5 for a 16- or 20-oz drink, said Boba Tea Direct, a company that sells bubble-tea products wholesale to businesses. The drink costs about 75 cents per serving to make, which provides room for a big comment if you can convince people to keep coming back. The key is to buy supplies and ingredients at wholesale prices. Introduce people to bubble tea by offering trial-sized portions on the street just outside your store or inside your store. Set up large sandwich and on top of the door signs showing the way. Find the help of your local media to cover your grand opening. Provides information about the history of the drink, which was created in Taiwan in the 1980s. To differentiating yourself from other specialty drink stores, consider using organic or fresh local fruits or specific brands of tea and letting customers know that's what makes your drink so delicious. Legend has it that a teahouse manager in Taiwan, bored during a long meeting, dumped tapioca pudding in an iced tea, decided it actually tasted pretty good, and added their concoction to the The new tapioca tea has their biggest seller, and a trend has been born, spread throughout Taiwan and beyond. Now bubble teashops are around the world, flavors ranging from lychee and kumquat to red bean matcha and coconut milk tea. Bubble tea - also known as boba tea or milk tea - is typically made by adding a scoop of black tapioca pearls to the bottom of a cup, pouring into cold green or black tea, and mixing in fruit juices, fruit puree, chocolate, milk, and other flavorings. It is vigorously shaken (the bubbles in bubble tea actually refer to the bubbles that form when mixed) and served with a wide straw that allows space for the pearls to be sucked up along with the tea. You drink the tea and then chew the pearls. Because it's a tea-based drink, bubble tea has earned something of a health catch. After all, tea - especially green tea - is known for containing disease-fighting compounds. Tea is rich in natural plant chemicals called polyphenols, which can help reduce inflammation and act as antioxidants in the body, shielding cells from damage. Not baring anyone's bubble, but just like calorie-packed menu items at coffee shops, bubble tea can be more like a dessert than a drink. Although the tea itself is obviously very low-calorie, some of the concoctions pack a solid amount of added sugar thanks to ingredients such as fruit juice and flavored syrup. The pearls - sweet, cold balls made from the starchy cassava root - add more than 200 calories per half-cup. And bubble tea portions can be just as oversized as venti mochas. A large tiramisu bubble tea at my local store watches in at more than 500 calories. Speaking of health concerns around bubble tea, I should also mention that there are rumors that the signature tapioca pearls contain potentially harmful chemicals. A few years ago, researchers from Germany identified chemicals in the pearls that were wrongly labeled as PCBs, a class of compounds that could be cancer-releasing. But according to the University of California Berkeley, it has been unproven ever since. The compounds in the tapioca are actually chemicals used in food flavorings and are approved for use by the FDA. If you've caught the bubble-themed bug and want to lighten your beverages, there are a few things you can do: Most stores let you choose your level of sweetness (including unsweetening), so opt for a lower sugar level than the default. Ask for regular milking instead of sweet ice cream or sweetened condensed milk. You can also go pearl-free - or light on pearls - to save 100-200 calories. Check menu boards for calorie counts and swallow (and chill!) on the lighter drinks more often than the indulgent picks. And stick to the smallest size, which is typically already generous. © 2019 WebMD, LLC. All rights reserved. See all blog posts (Image credit: Black Girl Gamers) Black Girl Gamers (BGG) will launch its first online gaming summit, formed entirely of black female professionals in the gaming industry, on Saturday, June 13 at 7PM GMT/2PM EST/4AM June 14 AEST. There will be gifts, panels and a number of keynote speakers ready to delve into the worlds of voice acting, streaming, and building and maintaining a brand within the game. BGG is a global era (and LGBTQIA+) inclusive multi-platform gaming community founded by UK influencer and writer Jay-Ann Lopez as a response to her experience in the often hostile gaming community as a black woman. It started as a small Facebook group in 2015 and now boasts a growing community of more than six thousand members. It was created to be a safe space for black female gamers from all walks of life, and a platform for black women seeking breaks in the game and streaming industry. BMCs run several events, including fundraisers, US and UK community encounters and also offer a weekly roster of black female streamers who aired as part of the BGG stream team on Twitch.Breaking new groundlast year at the Facebook headquarters in London, BGG ran Gamer Girls Night In, a celebration of all things playing and beauty for women, and it was the first all-female game event in It featured keynote speakers and panel discussions from the likes of TV presenter and journalist Elle Osili-Wood, esports commentator Julia Hardy and popular cosplayer Mimi The Nerd.The event was hosted and co-produced by Jay-Ann Lopez (founder of Black Girl Gamers) and leading game, Comics and anime content creator Nnesaga.Black Girl Gamers summit This year's Black Girl Gamers summit is in partnership with Twitch and will air on Twitch's cover on June 13.The panelists include black voice actors like Cara the voice of Becky Bond in Titans and Xenia in Assassin's Creed Odyssey - who will talk about the world of voice acting from the perspective of voice directors actors in the industry. Ximiramira, a streamer and Sims mud who boasts 240,000 followers across multiple social media networks, will join a panel of other successful black female streamers to discuss their experiences and give their advice on navigating the streaming community. There will also be esports commentators discussing the scene and needed to start your journey in comments. The head of Diversity and Inclusion and the Chief Diversity Officer at Riot Games will also be in discussion, as well as a panel dedicated to making your brand in the industry, which will include Ubisoft's International Product Manager, Andrien GbinjigleMost, more important of all, the first BGG Online summit will be an opportunity for black girl gamers to obtain valuable information on how to approach industries within the game. Although Black Girl Gamers is a female-only group, the summit will be hosted on Twitch's cover for anyone to tumble in, and will be a great way for others to learn something about the problems black women face in the gaming community, and to promote greater understanding between different gaming subgroups. The BGG Online Summit has been an idea of mine since 2019, but the timing wasn't right, says Jay-Ann Lopez. Its aim is to increase the visibility of black streamers, voice actors and industry professionals with a focus on being predominantly on black women. Panels and game events happen all the time, but rarely do these people let their whereabouts speak or even share the conversation. In this summit, the speakers are the conversation — they get the recognition that they are due if at least they are just from BGG.
